Some of the information is needed right away, some in one hour and some in several months. I would like to be able to set it up so that the program will call for the information in the database for each ID, but not have to wait until the response is received before continuing. Right now I am trying to use the requests module with the threading.Thread class. The problem is that it is calling the function to do the database lookup synchronously, which means the program never gets to proceed with the next step. Here is a small snippet: class ActiveThread(threading.Thread): def __init__(self, protocol_factory, datatype_factory, dataset): threading.Thread.__init__(self, self.protocol_factory = protocol_factory, self.datatype_factory = datatype_factory, self.dataset = dataset) def run(self): try: self.dataset.get_result(self.protocol_factory, self.datatype_factory, self.dataset) 6a5af4b4c

ASUS provides the recommended settings for all their routers in the start menu. You can always change the settings to your desire if you wish to do so. Its helps, when your neighbours have the same router as you do, the software allows you to see the neighbour's router in the application and know how to connect to it. Additionally, when connecting to a wireless network, the application does list the networks available and which is the best network. Very helpful and can not be found anywhere else. For example, when I was using a new router with a question mark, I used the software to determine what WEP and WPA were all about. Most importantly, the software and the software alone can allow the search engine to know where the file to install was saved, allowing the software to search for the router in the start menu. Good job ASUS! Keep up the great work! :) I've had the same experience. I've been using the bundled software since 1.0 and it has changed for the better.
