Low serum insulin concentration is a risk factor for the development of acute coronary syndrome. In this study we investigated the predictive ability of insulin concentration to cardiovascular mortality in non-diabetic patients with acute coronary syndrome. We measured serum insulin concentration in 386 (93.2%) of 415 consecutive patients with non-diabetic acute coronary syndrome and their clinical characteristics, including insulin concentration, were compared to those of 232 survivors (67%) and 172 non-survivors (32%). Prognosis was evaluated in relation to death by a multivariate analysis. Insulin concentrations were higher in the acute myocardial infarction (AMI) group than in the unstable angina pectoris (UAP) group (14.0 +/- 16.5 microU/mL vs. 7.8 +/- 8.9 microU/mL, p Currencies About Me I love flowers, color, art & creativity. communication with an ink conduit supplying ink to the chamber. The ink conduit is coupled to a pressurized ink source. An electrical pulse applied to a piezoelectric transducer within the chamber generates a pressure wave that causes ink contained in the chamber to be ejected through the nozzle aperture. To prevent the ink from flooding back into the chamber, a portion of the chamber wall is tapered from the nozzle aperture to the chamber. In prior art printers, the nozzle apertures must be sealed against leakage. In most cases, a gasket is placed on the wall of the nozzle aperture to seal the nozzle aperture against leakage. The gasket may be made of a resilient material such as silicone. Typically the gasket is dispensed between the nozzle aperture and the chamber wall. Often the gasket is cut in the form of a slit or a notch to permit the gasket to be readily disposed in the nozzle aperture. If the gasket is not properly placed in the nozzle aperture, there is a possibility that the gasket will not provide the necessary sealing. For example, if the gasket is disposed in the nozzle aperture and springs inwardly toward the nozzle aperture, the sealing effectiveness of the gasket will be degraded due to the spring force.
