It looks at the different forms of law in the courtroom and how this reflects a reinterpretation of the law. This could be achieved through interpretative means such as statutes, case law and social norms. Through exploring these aspects it would appear that the older practice of interpretation is no longer being used and the newer forms of legislation and case law are becoming a more powerful way of understanding and interpreting the law. This does not mean that interpretation is not still playing a functional role. The judiciary simply requires other means in order to decide cases and chose the appropriate interpretation from which to find the 'correct' interpretation. If the justices in court were to use the same 'formulaic' approach they would conclude that the two witnesses had testified correctly and that the offender had killed the victim. They would have decided that the act had been committed by the accused. This would mean that they had ascertained the necessary facts, a view that is supported by the following quotation from Blackstone's Commentaries: 'The truth of the fact, which we must know, is hereby asserted by two witnesses only'. (234; emphasis added) This is not to suggest that the law was less fluid in the seventeenth century. On the contrary, the early instance of a labour contract was even more formal and defined. This is an example of the legal definition of contracts as a formal document. Another example of how the law has grown to be more defined and formal is the issue of the '
