Technical Field This invention generally relates to theft deterrent systems for electronic control devices. More particularly, this invention relates to a theft deterrent system which attaches directly to an electronic control device, without the need for wiring to be provided between the control device and an alarm system. Specifically, the theft deterrent system in accordance with the present invention provides an electronic circuit and a battery recharging circuit for the electronic device, and a digital indicator for indicating whether the electronic control device is locked or unlocked. II. Background Art More recently, theft deterrent systems have been developed for electronic control devices such as, for example, electronic door locks. A typical electronic control device has a keypad and, when locked, an alarm which activates an alarm circuit. When the control device is unlocked, the alarm circuit is deactivated. Some electronic control devices have a limited "open time", the period of time, after which the device unlocks automatically, thereby providing an enhanced level of security in comparison to a typical electronic lock. In general, a theft deterrent system, such as a theft deterrent lock or a keyless entry system, allows the user of a control device to easily gain entry to the control device, yet provides an increased level of protection against theft. Typical electronic control devices have a control device wiring harness which is connected by a wiring harness connector to an alarm system wiring harness. The control device wiring harness is expensive, and a wiring harness connector is usually provided to decrease the cost of the control device wiring harness. The incorporation of a theft deterrent system into an electronic control device, however, often requires the user to hardwire a wire to the control device, to thereby connect the control device to the alarm system wiring harness.
