Gmail's 2-factor authentication, which is the lack of a time-based login, a unique password, and the option of using another device to log-in to the account. This might be a decent security practice to follow, or another method of hacking someone's email and account. If you are using Gmail, you might know that the ID you are using on the website to register is your email address, but it is in the physical world your address is your ID. As soon as your email address is leaked into the cyber world, your identity is compromised. The cyber world is a dangerous place to live in. If you're a computer nerd, like myself, you have a higher risk of being hacked. Hackers have a lot of ways of hacking into computers. Virus's have a lot of ways of stealing personal information. Why do we not protect our computers and accounts? It's because people assume they're not going to get hacked if they use an email address they know, and if you want to use multiple accounts, they
