And the last thing I tried was to update the latest drivers for my video card and that I have come across a solution as I spent hours on internet forums looking for a solution to no avail. I found a solution but not being an expert in this field I should do some more digging. Before trying any of the solutions I will post them here in case they don't help: Solution 1: In my case I had the same problem as the question poster had and using the external monitor on my laptop was not an option for me. I used an HDMI cable (the one that plugs into a monitor or TV) and my monitor. I needed to set up the device that uses the HDMI cable as an output and the monitor as an input. If you follow these steps you should be able to solve the problem: On the computer: Go to the Windows device manager Go to the list of devices and make sure that your monitor is listed On the monitor Go to the monitor and see if it lists the device in the device list If it doesn't, go to the device manager and make sure that the driver is correctly installed Solution 2: I found another (newer) solution. I believe that this problem is caused by the graphics card driver not supporting the monitor. You can turn the switch and see if that solves the problem. Solution 3: When using a computer that has an ATI GPU I found another solution. In the driver information at the bottom of the screen you can see a ATI connection. Choose that and click on additional driver options. There you have a list of the latest drivers that were available. This may be a solution if you have an ATI GPU and as well as a non ATI GPU. Solution 4: Please be sure that your PC is up to date. I found that the Windows update sometimes failed to update everything on my PC. I'm sure there are other PC in the world that runs the same OS version and have these problems but I'm not aware of them. Solution 5: Occ13bf012
