The present invention relates generally to network communications, and more particularly, to a method of controlling and monitoring network communications in data centers. Data centers are areas used to house various computing or telecommunications devices. These devices may include servers, routers, switches, and other electronic devices. In large data centers, these devices may be interconnected using a network. The network is typically built by placing numerous cables and wires throughout the data center to allow the various devices to communicate with each other. Sometimes, devices will be housed on a raised structure called a raised rack. The raised rack is generally a container, which contains a large number of small compartments for housing devices. A raised rack is preferred in many instances over placing devices on a floor because the devices may be located in a more efficient manner. Additionally, a raised rack reduces the amount of space needed for a given number of devices because the devices do not need to be placed on the same plane. However, multiple cables and wires are needed to interconnect the devices in order to build and maintain the network. Accordingly, various cables are placed throughout the data center to allow the various devices to be interconnected. A data center will also include various devices, such as power supplies, generators, air handlers, cooling systems, environmental monitoring devices, and other equipment to provide these devices with electricity, air, cooling, and other utilities. Each of these devices will have a set of cables running to them in order for the devices to operate.
