A typical CPU is made up of a number of cores and threads running in parallel on the same integrated circuit (IC). The threads may operate in lock-step or independently. The system spends the majority of time executing threads in lock-step. The threads work on separate tasks and have their own separate instruction pipelines. In each thread, the core is either executing the current instruction or waiting to execute an instruction. The instruction pipeline has one or more stages of latency (time for the pipeline to load the next instruction) and the instruction pipeline stages are typically designed to be overlapping. When the CPU is idle, a thread is typically in a sleep state and is available to resume execution immediately upon a next instruction fetch. This state is called an idle state. On entry into the idle state, the CPU state is valid, the instructions in the pipeline stages are valid, and the execution state of the thread is ready for execution. On exit from the idle state, the instructions in the pipeline stages are still valid but the state of the core is invalid. The execution state of the thread is not valid. The thread must then be put back into an active state. While in the idle state, the CPU spends most of its time in the idle state waiting for an instruction fetch. This is the case because there are no new instructions to fetch. At some point, the thread will be ready to resume execution. When the thread is ready to resume execution, the CPU state must be saved. The state of the CPU and the thread must be saved for a period of time that is long
