AutoWindowManager is a simple and easy-to-use application to handle multiple windows in Windows. It automatically manages the windows so that they don't overlap on the screen, display their title and/or class name and maybe minimize to the tray when they are closed. Select the windows you want to manage by double clicking on the titlebar. The window can be anything from a process, to a PDF document, to a browser window. Now the settings for how and when to start the windows, or make them hidden or minimize to the tray, can be setup. Plus many more advanced features like adding and removing windows to the list, checking if a window is active, changing transparency and many more. There is a batch file that makes it pretty easy to start and stop the application by clicking on an executable file. Some features, like moving a window to any position in the list or packing it as titlebar only, require administrator rights. AutoWindowManager.msi file may be compatible with the PortableApps.com platform. The program installer also includes a portable version of AutoWindowManager.exe. Double-click on a portable icon to extract the application to the temporary folder of your portable disk. (Portable version was tested on Windows 7 Ultimate x64 with SP1 and .Net 4.0.) Media from rat aortas relaxed by the removal of endothelium were investigated for nitric oxide (NO) content, guanylate cyclase activity, and NO-synthase activity. The media from K⁺-depolarized aortas contained high levels of NO (62 +/- 8.3 microM/mg) and guanylate cyclase activity (330.2 +/- 24.6 pmol cyclic GMP/mg protein/min). The relaxations elicited by the removal of endothelium and the addition of 0.01 to 10 mM KCl to the media were not affected by an inhibitor of guanylate cyclase, methylene blue. The KCl-induced relaxations were attenuated by an inhibitor of guanylate cyclase (10⁻⁴ M ODQ), an inhibitor of NO-synthase (10⁻⁴ M L-NG-nitroarginine, L-NAME), or tetrodotoxin (TTX). These results indicate that NO is one of the factors responsible for the relaxation of rat aortic strips and that the different KCl-induced relaxations may reflect differences in the mechanisms responsible for the release of NO from the endothelium. Q: How do I center a horizontally centered figure? The following image shows the default alignment: I tried using \centering which didn't work. I tried \left (top) and \right (bottom) which didn't work. I tried using \hspace but this didn't seem to work either. Any suggestions?
