Your Gaming. more for Android, iOS, and Windows.Cells in body tissues are highly plastic, and thus they can adapt to survive in an ever changing environment. This adaptation to environmental changes is regulated by the cellular response to stress. The accumulation of unfolded or damaged proteins in cells results in stress, triggering the UPR, a complex and highly regulated signaling pathway which is designed to restore protein homeostasis (pH). Under normal circumstances, the UPR of the endoplasmic reticulum (ER) is kept under control by activation of protein kinase RNA-activated protein kinase-like ER kinases (PERK, pef2a), which phosphorylate elf2a. elf2a suppresses translation of most mRNAs, but promotes the translation of several mRNAs including ATF4 mRNA. ATF4 expression leads to the down-regulation of HSPs and thus creates conditions that promote the degradation of misfolded proteins. All together, this cellular response acts to restore ER function and its efficiency is precisely regulated. This is achieved through a balance between activation and inactivation of different arms of the UPR. However, this balance can be distorted when the level of accumulation of unfolded proteins in the ER reaches a threshold, leading to chronic ER stress and activation of the UPR. Chronic ER stress is associated with various disease states. The activation of the UPR is therefore tightly controlled. Its efficiency is modulated by activators and inhibitors that modulate the activity of the elf2alpha kinases PERK and IRE1, which respectively phosphorylate elf2a and Spliced Xbp-1, respectively. By acting on elf2a, it negatively affects the ability of the cells to handle unfolded proteins, and by acting on the splicing factor Spliced Xbp-1, it results in the expression of genes encoding proteins that are important to the resuming of protein synthesis and to the degradation of misfolded proteins. Chronic stress has become an accepted concept in different research fields, particularly in the context of the neurodegenerative diseases. The relative importance of chronic versus acute ER stress is a recurring issue in research.
