RAM.Manufacturer Details.Reporting and analysis of injuries sustained in professional sports. To define the incidence of injury in a variety of professional sports by examining injury occurrence and severity; the number of games or practices missed due to injury; the length of time missed because of injury; the number and type of injuries; and the location of injury in each sport. Prospective, observational cohort study. Annual training camps and the regular season. Twenty-three National Football League (NFL) football teams. Of the 59 1,000-plus players participating in the NFL in 2005, 559 reported injury to 1,512 health care providers during the regular season. The average player was injured 16.3 times over the course of a career; the average player participated in 4.9 practices and missed 1.2 games because of injury. The proportions of players sustaining a total of 628 upper body and 410 lower body injuries were 9.4% and 19.4%, respectively. Of upper body injuries, 73.7% were sprains; of lower body injuries, 33.5% were bruises and contusions, 24.0% were strains, and 21.4% were fractures. There were 140 unique types of injury. Lisfranc foot injuries constituted 10.0% of all lower body injuries. The proportion of players sustaining a total of 24 concussions was 2.1%. The most common injury-causing mechanisms were joint hyperextension and abrasion, fatigue, and slips/trips. Players were injured on average in 3.0 sports or activities during the course of a season. In professional football, the average player sustained 1.2 injuries per season, missed 1.2 games because of injury, and incurred 140 injuries of different types during a career. The top 2 injuries were sprains and bruises/ e79caf774b
