.This invention relates to a portable terminal device, such as, for example, a cellular telephone (hereinafter referred to as a mobile unit), a paging receiver, or a personal information terminal device, and a method for recording operation data for an electronic apparatus, which apparatus is incorporated in the portable terminal device. The so-called cellular telephone is, for example, portable and has a function for storing a large amount of data. For example, such data include music data read from a built-in memory, voice data inputted through a microphone, and image data read from a CCD (Charge Coupled Device) imaging device. In the cellular telephone, the data may be set to allow retrieval at any desired time, or may be retrieved periodically. The user of a cellular telephone does not necessarily use the cellular telephone in such a manner that operation data for use in setting and retrieving the data are recorded. In the following description, the operation data are referred to as an operation log, and may be recorded temporarily. The operation log is ordinarily recorded in a memory card. The memory card includes two types, a first type that can be incorporated in a cellular telephone, and a second type that can be directly connected to a data line of the cellular telephone. For this reason, with the first type of memory card, it is difficult to erase the operation log once it is recorded. With the second type, the operation log can be erased by the user himself or herself, but the user is inconveniently required to have a special tool. For this reason, it is desirable to provide a memory card which can record or read data, such as the operation log, regardless of the type of apparatus to which the memory card is incorporated. A memory card of this type may be provided with, for example, a spring or the like for causing the memory card to be attracted to or repelled from the apparatus. Thus, the memory card is taken out of or incorporated into the apparatus, which is convenient. However, it is difficult to adjust the degree of attraction or repulsion. For this reason, it is difficult to incorporate the memory card in an apparatus, whose size and shape have not been previously determined. It is, therefore, an object of the present invention to provide a portable terminal device in which an operation log can be easily recorded or read. It is another object of the present invention to provide a portable terminal device in which an operation log is stored in such a manner as to be housed in a space

Kaz there is nothing wrong with that either. The best results will be attained on engines that will still be running for 5 or more years. To answer your question, I think you will need a professional mechanic. The information I have is what I have heard about from other engine owners. Fair enough, but it would be nice to have some third party input on this, I would imagine it could have some interesting results (but if it would be a better idea to do the work in house then I guess that's ok). I'll start off by saying the engine here is an OLD engine that's not running right now, however, the owner, who knows quite a bit about engines would like to get it back in running form and we're looking to make the best decision possible on what to do. Looking at it from the outside, it would cost quite a bit to overhaul the engine and not much to service/adjust it. We have a bunch of experience dealing with all kinds of engines, so we're comfortable trying to do this ourselves. I found this link in a folder that was on a hard drive that was in the engine while it was in disrepair but I'm not sure if it has any validity. It just seemed odd that someone here went to the effort of building a custom water chiller, and since no one had bothered to make anything like it so far I figured it might be worth looking into. I'd appreciate it if someone knowledgeable in these areas could weigh in on this, as it's in a group of posts about cooling systems that were on a different sub-forum.

Perhaps someone has a better idea or a e79caf774b
