Q: mips conditional interrupts i have read and implemented about the conditions and interrupts in the book "Burgess the Mips Hacker" in its chapter 5 they are saying that Interrupts are 'hard-wired' into the processor and are forced at run-time, whereas conditions are checked at run-time and are 'soft-wired' into the processor. i am really getting confused here but how can this be true if a hardware condition is checked at run-time please help

A: The answer to your question is shown right in the paragraph that you quote: ...the processor does not know what interrupts (interrupt 0, 0x80-0xFF) will occur, but knows what conditions will occur. So a processor that checks a condition at run time determines what interrupts to use in code running on that processor. In other words, the interrupt condition is checked at run time. The example you cite, however, is not typical, that is, it has an IF statement that does not evaluate to true or false, but goes ahead and does its thing with the attached interrupts and the IF is just a way to report the result. The first paragraph you quote, though, is typically correct. Of course, it could be wrong if the processor is checking a condition before an interrupt is called that takes more than, e.g., one cycle. In this case, there could be a race condition because the interrupt routine will not get to see the latest value of the condition before the interrupt routine runs.

My time on Columbia was short, but you cannot describe it as any less than grueling. Not only did we have to focus on building the business in new ways, we also had to cope with extensive business challenges, legal battles and economic uncertainty (i.e., the early Seventies). Fortunately, we had a great team and a great work ethic. And we were fortunate to have record company executives of the caliber of Al Ham to guide us
