Summary: If you have one of the older PowerBooks, you'll want to use one of the following methods to get the best performance from your new Mac. Make sure you partition your drive appropriately if you're converting to an SSD – you'll need to provide enough space for OS X, plus a full backup of your data. If you have an SSD and a hard drive, partition your hard drive before converting to an SSD. Be sure to create a separate bootable partition (using Disk Utility) and set the Mac's bootable flag for the partition using the defaults command. You'll also need to remove your Mac's proprietary hard drive bays, if you've still got them, to let your new SSD run air, then add them back to your computer when you're ready to install an HDD. Finally, check out our guide on how to convert your entire drive to an SSD for a lightning-fast Mac. Free Your Mac's Boot Drive Your new MacBook Pro or MacBook Air will be booting from your internal SSD drive. If you have an optical drive or are not using your Mac daily, it's often a good idea to remove it for performance and protection reasons. You can remove the disk easily by opening the bottom of the Mac and prying up its bottom cover. Be careful as it is a bit more fragile than before and you should be careful when doing so. After removing the disk, reconnect it and configure it in your system preference's startup disk preferences. This will allow you to boot from

I see a lot of sites on the internet which wait until the user has logged-in before allowing them to do other things on the site. For example, when you login to Facebook, you are presented with three options: Continue to fbook.com Continue to about.com Continue to Google.com For an e-commerce website, it makes sense to have the user complete their purchase before they are allowed to proceed to the checkout. The problem arises when you would like to log the user out to allow them to do other things on the site. For example, how does ebay know which of the three options to present? Is there any reason why we cannot leave the login screen until the user approves the options? A: Part of the point of any login process is to prevent "man in the middle" attacks. Once a logged in user has requested to continue the site, there's no reason to allow other sites access to their account. After all, if you've already logged in you can be pretty confident that you know who you are and you're not going to give your account details to a bad guy. The only exception is if you want to share your account on Facebook, which is a bit of a controversial decision. By the time you're finished with the Facebook log in, you'll already be on the site and they are making a request to be allowed to continue. A: This is generally to protect you against session hijacking. Someone could login and if you ask for their Facebook credential, they could just as easily tell you whatever they wanted you to read. If the site allows you to pay for something without your approval, the malicious person could
