In the past, alternating current electric motors were positioned in vehicles, such as automobiles and trucks, where it was desirable to have the motor mounted in such a way as to drive the vehicle wheels as part of the drive system. Such arrangements provided a convenient location for the motor to provide drive torque to the vehicle wheels while having a minimum in the number of added parts. The early design of motors provided the desired drive torque but necessitated the use of slip rings, brushes and other electrical connections which were relatively costly to manufacture and maintain. Attempts have been made to eliminate such electrical connections, but these have met with only limited success, as the added complexity tends to reduce the reliability of the device. In particular, attempts to eliminate electrical connections have resulted in utilizing a rotor which remains free from the stator by means of magnets whose magnetic fluxes are effective to hold the rotor in axial alignment with a stator mounted within a housing. However, the use of magnets has several disadvantages, as for example they require additional parts and are inherently less reliable. In particular, attempts to use magnets have been of a mechanical design whereby after the stator and rotor are mounted in their housing, the rotor is mounted on a shaft and keyed at a plurality of locations to maintain the rotor against rotation. It has been recognized that such mechanical arrangements present difficulty in positioning the rotor with respect to the stator during assembly.

Thus, the need for mechanical fixing devices of substantial complexity, which are not totally reliable, has thus been a limitation on the development of induction motors which have eliminated the use of slip rings. The Elizabeth I monument, unveiled in 2000, is a 4.5 tonne, 5.4 metre-high ivory tusk that took three years to carve by a team of skilled Somali and British carvers. It depicts a human face and body between parts of an elephant. It is made up of 10,950 tusks that weigh a total of eight tons. Pepys Museum The pyramid was carved from a single piece of tusk, which was combined with other tusks. The tusk is split into 81 panels that are joined with wooden "tile" to create the pyramid. Pepys Museum Pepys Museum The pyramid takes the form of a throne, on which sits a seated female figure. She is posed between the tusks and bears a striking resemblance to Elisabeth I. Pepys Museum As well as ivory, this tusk was carved with silver and gold, which would have been quite difficult to achieve using only wood. Pepys Museum The monument depicts the Queen as she would have appeared around the late 1560s. It was on her installation as Queen in 1603 that the monument was moved to its present site. Pepys Museum The pyramid is not standing on any kind of pedestal. It is supported by a chamfered cartouche that bears Elizabeth's full title, naming her as "Virginia and Kent, Queen, Governor of the Province of the Massachusetts Bay in New England." Pepys

Museum One of the panels is inscribed with a prayer, attributed to Thomas Abel, the English minister in North America, which reads: "Almighty God, of thy great bounty, the humble thankful remembrance of thy servants do
