You can find me on Twitter as @P_SalaminQ: How do I create one button that changes its background for a couple different states I have an app that has some background images that work fine on their own (by my own design). The problem is that we want the user to be able to select a different image when the app is in question/favorit/recent/etc. picture mode. My current solution is to have a background image for each "state" and have a button that changes its background image at runtime. This works fine, but I'd like to keep everything with images as I already have over half the app's images laid out. How can I easily switch between one background image for each state without having to manually re-lay out my buttons? A: You can create a Button with two xml layout files... layout_one.xml layout_two.xml Then in code for your button you can do: Button myButton = (Button) findViewById(R.id.button1); myButton.setBackgroundResource(R.layout.layout_one); //etc... In other words, the android framework will lay out the button to match the background resource you specify in the xml file. Then to modify the button you just change the background resource (again you can specify the layout xml file in the code to change the background). For more info, I'd suggest you take a look at the Android Developer API on working with layout xml files.
