The gene transfer method will be compared with a more traditional protocol of subretinal cell injection to determine which technique may be preferable for human clinical trials. We will perform gene transfer into the human retina using viral and non-viral vectors. This type of optical system uses a mirror that can be selectively made in an electrically conductive state to control a polarization state of incident light on the mirror. As one example, a polarization beam splitter has been known that arranges a transparent conductive film on a surface of a glass plate or the like that is an incidence surface (see, for example, Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 2002-137722 and Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 2005-157780).
