October 12, 2015 SMTP - Port 587. Everything is moving to the cloud. We can't live without the internet. As a computer user, you probably have an active email account on the Internet. You may even have a Hotmail, Yahoo, Gmail or many other email services on the Internet. Very likely you have more than one, and a lot of them. Or even a lot more. Your email is your mail and the only way to communicate with people. It is the only way for you to send messages to other people. It is even the main way how you will update your friends about your life events. It is the way you will continue your education. One important note about being able to send and receive emails is to use proper ports for doing so. Let's talk about which port is the right one for sending email. The sending port depends on the email program you are using. The most common port is port 587. In this article, we will show you how to get back to ports that have been closed or closed. First, we will look into some more information about this subject. You will find all you need about ports in order to properly send emails. Second, you will be provided with instructions on how to change the port to 587. How to change ports If you were using other programs to send and receive emails, the servers at sending and receiving ends would open a connection with 587. The connection will be bidirectional. In other words, the server at the email clients end will be able to send emails to the server at the sending end, and the server at the receiving end will be able to receive emails from the server at the receiving end. Keep in mind that these servers will close the connection after sending or receiving emails. To open a connection using 587 port, the software will open a connection with port 587. So, when you close the connection at sending and receiving end, you will have b7e8fdf5c8
