What's new in Snowball Saves Summer:

What we learned This project has got way more complicated than the mockup does. Just for clarification: The POPFP3 playtesting is not related to this client-side testing at all, it is simply to ensure that the client-part of PopSocket is working as expected, i.e., forwarded messages are received, replies are sent, etc. Regarding templates, I was expecting the new build system to dump the currently selected template into a config file. However, this didn't happen. One reason might be that the test-template is a very special case, where you don't actually have any predefined messages. Having this template in a config file would cause, when clicking all targets at once, the template when loading. This isn't very clear, even when you read the Bugs and Messages section very carefully. The big problem is that the target should receive the discovered messages. Due to the fact that the target is obviously redirected, the messages are simply dropped there, and we don't know how to recover them. Most of the messages actually get dropped due to the lack of notifiers at all. When a message gets discovered, the target gets unbound from the socket where it was bound initially. This should be caused by two things: Either errors occur when binding a target or a client tries to connect to a target that is not bound. Unfortunately, we don't know how to get the accurate info to use for the binding. There should've been some notifiers for the targets to hook in on, it might be mandatory for CQL too. We also don't know how to deal with auto-reconnects and the like. Snag the latest sources Click here to get the sources of the current ivy archive and start browsing. WARNING: What we have is the latest, not the actual running code, the sources don't compile easily due to numerous typos like missing "div's", etc. Modem Functions We ended up with two recently developed candidates for CQL and POE. The API is somewhat less straight-forward than we anticipated it would be. (At least it is for me.) The modems are a "goodie" though: They bring data to the clients, like the GET and PORT functions.

The delivery mechanism is UDP, so the modems do not have to bother
