Grinnell College, having just finished classes for the fall semester, is ready for a new challenge. Hormel Foods, the Minneapolis-based, health food and meat processing company, announced Wednesday it had acquired the college for $155 million, a transaction that was finalized Wednesday afternoon. Most of the school's 8,500 students and faculty were gone for the summer, and the administration and facilities were at a low point in the offseason. "Everything that goes into buying a school is a very long planning process, and we felt we could come in at a very strong time," said John Berg, a Hormel Foods senior vice president. "It's really a wonderful intersection of the two companies." The deal reunites Hormel, founded in 1894 in Austin, Minn., with the closely held college in Grinnell, Iowa. It also represents another step in the acquisition of the college by Hormel Foods, which already owns the existing Grinnell College. With this acquisition, Hormel is emerging from a period of shrinking revenues, declining market share and a slowed growth in new products. The challenges facing the company will add to Hormel's annual $2.5 billion in sales, which includes sales outside of the United States. Hormel offers products under its Jennie-O and National Food brands. National Food, which is the company's convenience foods brand, is particularly well known, and, like all Hormel products, is sold under a franchise system. Hormel is in 13 countries and serves about 90 percent of the U.S. grocery market. Its revenue has increased 14 percent in the past five years. Berg said the education company's back-to-school market provides a strong draw for the company, which is also
