Historians Face New Eyepiece of the Uncanny Man has sought to exploit the uncanny for his own ends for a very long time. He has tried to mask it by everything from art and literature to religion, to architecture. But what the world has always sought is the true ahistorical, the uncanny that is inherently timeless, and here is it: NUKE, a new scientific tool for manipulating the very air. It is the creation of two Montreal scientists, who view it as a new way to think about humankind's relationship with the physical world.

NUKE is described in an article in yesterday's National Post, and has a home page on the web here. I tried to make a link, but the article wasn't posted on the web site yet. NUKE, which stands for New Ultra-Kinetic Evaporator for the Mass Production of Nonlinear Ultrasound, is a box about the size of a microwave with some sensors. In a matter of microseconds, the box delivers focused soundwaves. These can be used to cut a hole in a material with much less energy than is required for guns; they can also create a miniature karate chop in the air. But, unlike karate chops or laser-fire, this can be done at any speed, and this has been the attraction of NUKE, and has been the source of some consternation amongst physicists and material scientists. When the technology was first developed, the potential of NUKE was unrecognized by those who were using it. "The real magic of the whole thing, of course, is that no engineer had ever done anything like this before," says Philip Alpers, associate professor in the department of electrical and computer engineering at McGill University. "It really is a new way of thinking about our own physical world. You're not going to find that idea in any book about science." ... In other words, they see it as a new way
