Figure 3-2: Photoshop gives you full control over your image, even if it's of a type you've never worked with. Photoshop has so much to offer that it's become a standard in any digital photography workflow (at least for most people). This means that you may know how to use this program and not use the program itself. Most photographers do this, even though Photoshop does a lot more than manipulating pictures. ## Getting the Most Out of Photoshop After you've chosen the best tool for the job, when you start tweaking a picture, make sure you do the following: Always create a new document for each new project. This prevents you from erasing or accidentally overwriting an image that you've been working on, making it necessary to do a lot of searching and hunting through your hard drive to find images that you may have been working on. Always save a version of your work in the background in case something goes wrong. Even the best programs have bugs in them. Something as simple as opening the wrong file or changing a setting can permanently affect an image that you were working on. Saves (and often backups) in the background are safe. Keep your work in a logical order. It's a lot easier to address problems if you know the order of all your files. If you save your file, be sure to save it as a `_psd_` file. The best place to start in Photoshop is to master the toolbar. It has all the tools you need to do any editing, and you can customize it to your liking. Here are a couple of quick tips to get you started with Photoshop: Preview your picture before beginning. Whether you save your project as a `_jpg_`, `_psd_`, or `_psb_` file, it's always a good idea to preview the image in case something happens. Previewing enables you to fix any problems before they happen. Be careful when moving images around. It is sometimes the easiest thing to just move an image and save it, but you may end up with a blank space where that image should be. The new position you chose may not be where you want it. To get around this problem, save a copy of the file to a new location. This new location should be near the area where you need the image, so that you can compare the files and see exactly how you move

The 2013 Heisman Trophy winner has been quiet ever since tearing his ACL in early December. He was spotted walking to work at Taco Bell last week and was spotted at Starbucks on Dec. 20, though he was not at his regular table. Do you have him at Taco Bell when he walks to his car? Do you have him at Starbucks? If so, share your story in the comments section. Heisman winner Johnny Manziel was not at a Taco Bell restaurant in Collin County, Texas. According to a quick check on Google Maps and on the website, My Burritos, Manziel was at one of the locations at the intersection of Loop 288 and Broadway Blvd. in Greenhouse, Texas, just north of Dallas, at 5:15 p.m. on Sunday evening. Manziel was in an SUV, looking at how one burrito is made. He left as he was watching the burrito being made. (NaturalNews) The battle between the American Medical Association and federal drug regulators over the legality of using statistical power to limit drug prescribing has just intensified. The fight between the FDA and AMA, which oppose each other over the safety and effectiveness of statin drugs, has pitted an insurance industry watchdog against a group of doctors working for a drug company, with consequences for millions of consumers. Three men in a modest-looking office in Alexandria, Va., are busy discussing the future of one of the most influential organizations in medicine – the American Medical Association. It is, of course, the only national medical group that has elected to oppose the Food and Drug Administration. A website in the state of California — where the FDA has successfully managed to push through strict legislation to limit the use of cholesterol-lowering drugs — cites the AMA as one of "the leading opponents" of the drug legislation. This is how the AMA spells it: "The American Medical Association (AMA) does not support legislation to limit the FDA's ability to regulate medical products, including statin drugs, because the AMA believes the statute will limit physicians' ability to prescribe statin drugs to patients who need them for cardiovascular health and are not at high risk of developing cardiovascular disease." This is how the FDA spells it: "In the United States, the Food and Drug Administration has the statutory authority to review medical products, including statin drugs, based on safety and effectiveness considerations, and to take action to regulate those products. The Food and Drug Administration will continue to do so in order to protect
