When a user is logged in, I've passed the correct information to my controller, which then logs in and returns the correct objects via JSON. I have the plugin running fine. However, I'm not really sure how to dynamically load a plugin based on the object I'm working with. Because I'm passing a unique ID back with each object, I was thinking that I could pass back that unique id to the plugin when it's required (in the 'data-plugin-id' attribute). Is this a bad approach? The reason I'm not loading this plugin when the application first loads is that this project is for a web site that needs to be updated frequently, so I'm loading the plugin only when it's required. Here's the plugin code: (function ($, undefined) { "use strict"; $.fn.artists = function (option) { var args = Array.prototype.slice.call(arguments, 1); this.each(function () { var $this = $(this), data = $this.data('artists'), options = typeof option === 'object' && option; if (!data) { $this.data('artists', (data = new Artists(this, options))); } if (typeof option === 'string') { args.shift(); $.each(args, function () { data[option].apply(data, [].concat(args)) }); } }); return this; }; // private var Artists = function (container, options) { var self = this
