"We're moving away from using crude shapes to emulate players to using a bunch of data that we have specific to the player and specific to the action they're playing," Creative Assembly senior producer Matt Mellia says. "We can really shape an AI player in a way that never has been possible before." An example of this new feature in action is Jordan with the ball deep in his own half, Jordan runs and a moment later he's picked up and turning and then he's going forward, towards the goal post. So it's not just that Jordan is running. He's running specifically in that direction. He's running in the right place in the right way. "All of a sudden," Mellia says, "that becomes a real set of parameters to teach AI to do something." The real-world data allows for attributes that would be difficult to represent in game. Let's use this example: a seemingly unstoppable hit because it has been drilled in a game. The same hit could actually catch Jordan off balance or change his trajectory in a way that would really impede his ability to move forward. "What's happening is we're creating a set of rules that we think this player is going to play," Mellia says, "and what would happen if we put that player into that moment in time." Another example Mellia gave was if a player has a weak foot. He may have difficulty running past an opponent, then if he goes to kick the ball he may find that foot can't kick the ball because it's not as strong as it is at other times. The main idea behind the new in-game artificial intelligence, Mellia says, is to move away from having a player that does one thing better than a player that does another. Instead, it's about the player doing his job in a way that's realistic in a vast array of situations. This will have a major impact on tactics and strategy. Tactics, Mellia says, have always depended on "skill, skill, skill." Using modern technology, players can use a variety of different tools to win or lose a game. This is what he means by breaking through the skill ceiling.
