Screening for colorectal cancer by colonoscopy or fecal occult blood test (FOBT) is increasingly used in many countries. This analysis evaluates the incremental cost-benefit of these two screening approaches. Incremental cost and benefit analysis was performed comparing 2-yearly colonoscopy, 1-yearly FOBT, and no screening. Incremental cost and benefit were then applied to the entire population in Canada, Australia, and the UK from 1995 to 2005. Incremental benefits were expressed in quality-adjusted life-years (QALYs) gained. Net costs were estimated at 2004 Canadian dollars. In 2005, screening colonoscopy would save an additional 5464 and FOBT would save 3058 QALYs. In Canada, colonoscopy would save 695,258 and FOBT would save 213,546 QALYs. Colonoscopy would save 13,638 QALYs and would therefore be more cost-effective than FOBT. In Australia, colonoscopy would save 18,903 QALYs, and would be more cost-effective than FOBT. In the UK, the incremental cost of colonoscopy over FOBT would be over 400,000 pounds (per QALY) to be cost-effective compared with FOBT (without consideration of the resulting savings in colorectal cancer death). A conditional strategy of colonoscopy is recommended as first-choice screening program in Canada, Australia, and the UK. не использовал, а его можно использовать. Использование у
