How to Talk to Your Kids about Social Media By Kelly Krause / September 18, 2014 Twitter Facebook LinkedIn Email Share

“Have a nice day,” your daughter says as she leaves for school. What was that? “Did you say ‘fing?’” she might ask in exasperation. Your wife may summon you from the kitchen to stop her before it’s too late. In this age of bite-sized social media, it can be hard to keep up with what your kids are doing. It’s no fun to get the bad news that your 20-year-old son has posted a picture of himself in the buff to his Facebook wall. He’s only upset because he’s yet to accept his mother’s online dating profile, or his dad doesn’t seem to remember he has a Facebook page. Sometimes, teens hide what they do online. They might be more likely to text or talk using Google Hangout. They might gather to hang out on Snapchat. But they might also be quietly posting or commenting, or updating their status, on their Facebook and Twitter accounts. So what should you say when kids start to behave differently or have questions about what they’re doing online? It’s probably a good idea to encourage them to talk to you about what they’re doing and what they’re learning, while also discussing the appropriate times and places for using social media. Kids are different when it comes to social media. It’s best to approach them with your questions and comments, and try to determine what will appeal to them. If you’re concerned about who they’re talking to, then you might offer them some privacy settings. It’s all about what you want and what they want, and how they’re willing to communicate. It’s all about setting limits. What do they do on social media? What’s the point of these technologies? Have they learned anything about themselves and others? Have they been taught skills to help them in the real world? What’s the difference between using social media for fun or work?

The most common form of CPR, or cardiopulmonary resuscitation, was derived from the needs of paramedics in the 1960s. Now that we're in the 21st century, we can update it a bit. A 2015 study in Resuscitation found that giving chest compressions every one-and-a-half minutes while giving two rescue breaths every two minutes was superior to traditional CPR; another recent study in Resuscitation noted that single rescuers can double the effectiveness of CPR by adding the aid of another rescuer. This kind of update is common in emergency medicine; generally speaking, the advice about CPR as published in textbooks is probably outdated. I'm here with Dr. David Sands, an emergency physician in the East Bay. Dr. Sands, I appreciate your being on this show. DAVID SANDES: It's my pleasure to be on. MARTIN: Let's start with something that you probably know pretty well. To me, it's kind of hard to imagine a scenario where CPR is going to help somebody who's having a cardiac arrest. But what should I know? Like, what are those circumstances? SANDES: Well, one very important thing that you've probably heard in other episodes is that for somebody to actually be resuscitated, they have to be in cardiac arrest. And what that means is that the heart is not beating normally, and if it's not beating normally, it's not getting blood going to the brain and it's not getting blood going to other areas of the body. That means that somebody who's having a cardiac arrest is in an emergency. And it's all about getting help for the patient when the patient is in the emergency. And it's really important that we as medical providers don't try to over-interpret things, because we probably aren't going to know what was going to have happened to the patient. I think of this as the only situation in which it's justified to give CPR to somebody. And, you know, just because somebody was in cardiac arrest d0c515b9f4
