The effect of implantable cardioverter-defibrillators on survival. Implantable cardioverter-defibrillators (ICDs) are associated with a significantly decreased risk of sudden cardiac death (SCD) in high-risk patients. The benefit of ICDs in these patients is consistent with the results of a large trial in primary prevention patients (COSS-I) and two other randomized trials. In addition to ICDs, implantable pacemaker (PM) devices are associated with a significantly decreased risk of SCD. Patients with heart failure are at increased risk of SCD and have an even greater risk of SCD if PMs also are placed. In these patients, the use of ICDs and PMs is associated with a significantly decreased risk of SCD compared with PM alone. In addition to ICDs and PMs, subcutaneous ICDs offer a potential alternative. More than 50% of survivors of SCD have ICDs in the United States, and approximately 10% of patients with an ICD are eligible for an additional PM. These data suggest that PMs should be avoided in patients with an ICD. Q: How does electric field of particle change if it moved with constant velocity Assume we consider a particle having some mass moving with constant velocity, but imagine the particle to be charged. How does the electric field of the particle change? Will there be a net force due to induced emf? A: In classical mechanics, the charge is forced to move in a straight line, with the given velocity  $v$ , along the electric field. The field line stays in a straight line, so the field does not change. Steroid hormones require low molecular weight thiols as co-ligands in the binding and activation of mammalian cytochrome P450 enzymes. A cy
