Q: What is, or might be wrong with, this timing diagram? As part of an artificial muscle project, I am trying to find out how much current is generated by a strain gauge when stretched. My reference is the paper How much power does a stretchable muscle generate?. This is the diagram, from that paper: First, I have some questions: What exactly is a double-ended strain gauge? Is that two strain gauges, each attached to a different face of the muscle? Or is it a whole device that spans all over the muscle? My naive guess is that the two electrodes would be connected in series. However, the paper says: "If the measuring circuit is using a straight series connection of the two cells, then for small 1-volt steps the response would be 15 mA, as shown in Fig. 4 (c) of [...]" The right-hand side represents the muscle (or maybe a muscle with four strain gauges). How can we be sure of this? I thought it was supposed to be a muscle, and the original paper says that it is. If the whole thing is connected in series, then when the muscle gets stretched, the current increases linearly (as long as the current is low)? If not, what I've written here is essentially unproven or wrong or both, and I'd be happy to hear why. Here is a video that shows the whole thing in action. (Pause the video to see the current spike and fade away.) A: The two gauges are put next to each other and between the two scales. The signal is obviously at this point coming from the right hand scale. The two parts are connected by the wire going out the back of the scale, in a configuration where they are in parallel. So the effective resistance of the gauge is the combination of  $R_2$  and  $R_3$ . This is the expected resistance when the muscle stretches or contracts, more or less depending on the position of the contact points with the gauges. Colour and
