Tissue expansion: a simple procedure to reconstruct large volume defects of the upper extremity. Large volume defects of the upper extremity usually require a microsurgical free flap for revascularization. The standard procedure involves operative site selection and sometimes flap or site-specific preparation. These procedures may prove to be unsatisfactory in selected cases. A simpler procedure is presented here based on tissue expansion. From January 1999 to December 2000, a total of 28 consecutive patients underwent tissue expansion of the upper extremity for coverage of large volume defects. The indications included loss of skin following burns (n = 20), arteriovenous fistula (n = 1), aggressive malignant tumors (n = 2), and septic wounds (n = 5). The flap sizes ranged from 22 cm(2) to 91 cm(2). All flaps survived well. Two patients had partial necrosis at donor sites, which healed with dressings. Two flaps with venous thrombosis required thrombectomies. In five patients, it was necessary to delay expansion until new skin was formed over the expanded skin. In two cases, there was partial necrosis of the expanded skin. The authors conclude that tissue expansion is a simple procedure for the repair of large volume defects and leads to good results with minimal donor site morbidity. Care should be taken to prevent venous thrombosis. @noop [, ()]{} @noop [, 6d1f23a050
