apparatuses for depositing matrix materials. Description of the Related Art Sputter and related deposition techniques have been used for centuries in various industries. Sputtering is the process of removing atoms or molecules from a target by bombarding it with energetic particles, i.e. ions or electrons. The resulting kinetic energy of the energetic particles causes a loss of material in the form of atoms or molecules from the surface of the target causing the atoms or molecules to be deposited on a substrate for further processing. The deposited materials typically have good film properties and can be used in many applications. In some cases, the deposited materials can be used to replace the target material in subsequent operations. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 7,980,406 (Zeng et al.) discloses that metallic and metal-containing materials can be deposited on a dielectric layer to form a semiconductor device. In this case, the deposited materials have been used to replace the target in subsequent operations. In contrast, current manufacturing processes have not adopted such a replacement approach for other applications, such as for ceramic materials used in the electronics industry for high-performance and high-reliability electronic components. The resulting atomically thin ceramic layers can be used to increase structural strength and can facilitate stress release, which leads to improved reliability of electronic devices. In addition, the use of such atomically thin layers allows the use of high temperature processes that would otherwise be problematic or even not possible with thicker layers. The thin layers may be deposited using various techniques, such as physical vapor 6d1f23a050
