The time-resolved fluorescence properties of a dye intercalated in a polymer host are investigated to explore their possible use in photochromic devices. Time-resolved fluorescence measurements are performed on a single crystalline dye-polymer nanocomposite sample which is illuminated by means of a pulsed excitation source. This way, both the kinetics of the dye deintercalation process and the efficiency of the photochemical reaction in the host polymer matrix are monitored at the same time.

The successful deintercalation of the dye molecules from the host polymer matrix is shown by the decrease in the emission intensity, as a result of the restoration of the pure crystal dye state. Furthermore, the ability of this study to quantify the deintercalation in terms of nanosecond time scales becomes apparent. The efficiency of the photochemical reaction in the host polymer matrix can be determined from the contribution of the dye's transient photophysics to the overall time-resolved fluorescence intensity.
